Introduction

The increasing level of air pollution across the globe has been a cause of concern for policy makers. Transport is a major energy consumer and among the largest sources of Green House Gas (GHG) emissions, the principal sources of urban air pollution that has impact on environment and human health.

International trends indicate that ownership of vehicles will continue to grow in the coming decades. The world will have 10 undertake measures to reduce total global GHG emissions by 40-70% below 2010 levels by 2050 in order to limit the worst impacts from global climate change.

The Electric Mobility and other low emission pathways have gained prominence as strategies to mitigate GHG emissions. This will improve air quality, decrease fossil fuel dependency and boost energy security. Kenya is embarking on an array of policy options to promote and manage the growth of e-Mobility to reduce the impact of vehicle emissions in the country.

The 2012 Integrated National Transport Policy (INTP) currently under review has made various recommendations to address climate change. This includes reduction of GHG emissions and exploitation of renewable energy resources. The development and growth of e-Mobility will thus benefit from the intensified efforts being made towards this end.

The country has electric power generation capacity of 3,000MW against peak demand of about 2,000MW. Over 90% of this is generated from renewable sources. The e-Mobility sector can utilize the excess capacity.

Kenya, through its Nationally Determined Contributions (NDC) to the Paris Agreement has committed to lower GHG emissions by 32% by 2030. The Transport sector can make its contribution towards this objective by adopting e-Mobility. The Ministry has embarked on the development of National Electric Mobility Policy, strategy and regulations to support the growth of the e-Mobility in the country.
