2. The parties were heard in Nairobi on 28th and 30th June, 1994 and 21st February, 1995, respectively. The parties relied on their written and verbal submissions.

AWARD

The Notification of Dispute Form "A" dated 28th February, 1992, duly signed by the parties was received by the court on 6th August, 1993, together with the statutory certificates signed by the Minister for Labour and the Labour Commissioner.

The grievants services were terminated on 15th August, 1988, all-gladly because they were casuals and the work they were doing had finished. The claimants submitted that they took up the matter with the respondents on behalf of the grievants but the parties could not agree on a settlement. As a result, on 22nd August, 1988, the dispute was reported to the Minister for Labour and an investigator was appointed to carry out investigations. The dispute was investigated and on 10th July, 1991, the Ministry's findings were released to the parties.

The Ministry's findings were that the respondents had on several occasions laid off casual workers without the claimants raising any objection. This dispute was found to be the first attempt by the claimants to challenge the respondents decision to terminate casuals. The Ministry recommended that those grievants who had already been re-absorbed in the employment should continue without interruption. Secondly, the respondents should endeavour to re-absorb the rest if possible. Those who would not be re-engaged should be paid the appropriate notice pay and pro rata leave depending on the years of service.

The decision was turned down by the respondents and the matter is now before the court for consideration.

This case raises some very interesting points like the definition of a casual employee and the employment of casual employees for long periods ranging from four to seven years and what terminal benefits are due to them if any.

The operations of the respondents are such that they have to employ casual workers quite often to be deployed at the port and their depots all over the country.

The Ministry of Labour investigator established that the grievants had worked for the respondents at one time or the other and were paid in accordance with individual terms of service which varied from employee to employee. The investigator also found that some of the grievants had served for as long as seven years but on termination they had received no service benefits.

The Ministry recommended that those grievants who had already been absorbed in employment should continue without interruption and the respondents should if possible endeavour to absorb as many as possible of the remaining grievants. The Ministry further recommended that those grievants who cannot be offered employment should be given appropriate notice pay to be determined by the regularity by which they had been receiving their wages and if service had continued uninterrupted for months then pro rata leave is due and it should be paid too.

The claimants accepted these recommendations but the respondents indicated that they could not do so.

The claimants are now demanding the appropriate notice pay in accordance with clause 43:1 of the parties collective agreement and also demand an eight months salary compensation for each of the grievants for suffering unfair termination.

This appears to be the first time in the long history of relations between the parties that the claimants are challenging a decision by the respondents to terminate the services of their casuals.

Interestingly most of the grievants performed clerical duties and for fairly long periods.

The court found itself in difficulty in deciding whether the grievants worked as casuals for a number of years without any break and decided to ask the planning and research division to go and examine all the relevant records pertaining to each one of the grievants. This they did.

The planning research division found that most of the records were missing which would have greatly assisted them in their investigation. The planning research division however did compile a report for the years 1987 and 1988 which the court has taken into consideration.

Three of the grievants namely Anthony Njogu, Dickson Juma and Fred Akabu have died.

The court has carefully considered the parties submissions and finds that although the grievants were termed casuals they were regularly employed by the respondents for long stretches of uninterrupted work because when work for them finished in one place they were sent to another depot where they were needed within the Coast Province.

The court considers the Ministry of Labour's recommendation to be somewhat in the right direction.

The planning research division have confirmed that nine of the grievants worked as clerks whereas in the country generally casuals are employed as general labourers.

The court notes that the claimants have submitted that the nine grievants' services were terminated because they had become their members.

The court finds that the respondents have failed to prove in court due to non-production of relevant records that the grievants were casual workers. The respondents were able to produce records for two years only.

After careful consideration of all the submissions the court finds that those of the grievants who were not absorbed by the respondents in regular employment and had served for more than five years should be paid KSh. 5,000 each and the others KSh. 3,000 each in full and final settlement of all their claims.

The court would like to advise the employers that they should strictly observe the legal provisions regarding employment of casual labour.

Dated the 19th April, 1995.
