THE INDUSTRIAL COURT OF KENYA AT NAIROBI

CAUSE NO. 66 OF 2004

KENYA SHOE AND LEATHER WORKERS UNION—(Claimant)

AND

ORBITSPOTS LIMITED—(Respondent)

AWARD

Murtaza Jaffer—Judge.

Members:

J.M. Kilonzo and J.G. Ngolo.

J. Bolo for the Claimant Union

Mrs. Onyango, Advocate—for the Respondent.

Issues in Dispute:

Non payment of Terminal Dues to David Karanja, Abdul Yusuf, Francis Gaitho, Benard Muasya, Jane Gachani, Harun Kitungulu and John Akumba.

The Respondent company was once a thriving business manufacturing sports goods and employing over 200 staff. It avers in the 1990s it became one of the casualties of the country's liberalization policy and by 1995 it had cut its staff by more than half. By 1999 further redundancies had reduced its staff to a mere seven (7) employees who are the subject of the dispute in this case.

The parties at all material times have had a collective agreement in force. The Respondent has been dealing with a Mr. George Gwako, the Claimant's Nairobi Branch Secretary.

The Respondent continued minimal operations with the 7 core staff (the Grievants herein) until about 2003 when it claims it was unable to pay the salaries of the remaining staff. It therefore decided to terminate the services of the Grievants as well. It then entered into negotiations with the Claimant union and agreed to make an ex-gratia payment to the Grievants in lieu of their terminal dues under the CBA between the parties. It was not at any point claimed by the Respondent that it had gone into receivership or had been declared bankrupt, either of its own motion or by its creditors. In fact, the Respondent retained a core management staff and only terminated the services of its unionisable employees.

The Respondent terminated the services of the Grievants pursuant to an agreement signed by the Respondent's Director, a Mr. Juma and Mr. Gwako on behalf of the Claimant union on 29th April 2003. The said agreement in part reads as follows:

"Both parties agreed that the employees who are union members be paid the sum amounting to KSh. 423636 for their terminal benefits and this will be full and final settlement."

When this amount is paid there will be no claims whatever against the employer. Only the employer and the union are the parties to use the collective bargaining agreement".

The said agreement then goes on to name the 7 Grievants who are to be paid between KSh. 55,080 and KSh 69,000.

The basis of the aforesaid agreement is a negotiation whose process was not revealed in Court. Mrs. Onyango referred us to the Respondent Appendix B as forming the said basis. Respondent's Appendix B is a letter dated 12th March 2003 from Mr. Gwako to the Respondent as follows:

"RE: PAYMENT REQUEST TO SEVEN EMPLOYEES

"We are requesting you to pay the seven employees for the purpose of helping them as a gesture of goodwill."

"We concurred with you that they are not members of this organization and therefore not subjected to any agreement. But due to the relationship which had been there from the start, we request if something can be done to help them."

"We are also aware that there is no work going on due to the closure of the factory for a long time now, however we request if something can be done to help them."

"We hope this request will be positively received".

Pursuant to the aforesaid request and agreement, the Respondent made out payments which some of the Grievants refused to accept. It was alleged that they went to the Claimant's national office to inquire and were informed that the calculations were not correct and not in accordance with the CBA and further that the Branch Secretary had sold out to the Respondent and compromised the Grievants claim. Whilst none of this was proved in Court, the Secretary General of the Union seems to have taken over the case and pursued it with the Ministry and now in this Court. There seems to have been a major falling out between the General Secretary and the Branch Secretary who is allegedly to have been disciplined.

The Respondent averred that all this internal political battles within the union was of no concern to it. As far as the Respondent was concerned, there was a valid agreement between the contracting parties and the Court must uphold the same.

We have carefully looked at all the facts of this dispute and are indeed surprised at the manner in which it has been dealt with by all the three parties—the Claimant union, the Respondent employer and the Ministry of Labour as conciliator. The only persons who do not seem to have really mattered to the parties are the actual beneficiaries of the outcome of this dispute – the Grievants. There is no evidence of any kind that the Grievants were at any time consulted on the matter. The Respondent alleged that there were discussions with the union and the Grievants but no documentary or oral evidence to that effect was produced in Court. The Claimant's letter of 12th March 2003 begging for a favour from the Respondent was the only document referred to by Mrs. Onyango. It is not evidence of negotiation by any stretch of imagination. To the contrary, it is clear that the Grievants were not at any time made aware that the employer and the union's Branch Secretary were about to renege on the CBA. The alleged agreement makes no reference to the rights of employees and a subsequent agreement to pay less than what would be due in law with reasons for such reduction. Only a right holder may give up a right. No representative can give up a right without express consent of the right holder. If the request for a favour is the basis for agreement, then the whole matter is tainted with irregularity. The principal component of agreement is informed consent of the right holder that was clearly lacking in this matter. When the cheques were produced, some of the Grievants went to the national office and were properly advised that the amounts offered or accepted on their behalf was incorrect and inadequate.

The principal issue for determination therefore is whether the agreement between the Respondent and the Claimant union's Branch Secretary is valid and binding upon the parties? And whether this extends to the Grievants as well?

Before we turn to the issue in dispute, we would like to make some comments on the applicability of the CBA between the parties and the rights of unionisable employees. The Respondent averred that a CBA signed on 11th November, 1998 had been surreptitiously registered by this Court on 26th January, 2000 as the parties had not registered the said CBA "because the Union membership had reduced below 10 employees which is the number required for maintenance of a check-off list". We must confess that we fail to see the connection between a negotiated CBA and a check-off list.

When the CBA came up for registration before this Court in January 2000, the Respondent must have been informed. If the CBA negotiated between the parties was to be suspended from registration and rendered inoperable because the Respondent intended to reduce staff, the Respondent was obliged to enter into a supplementary agreement to that effect so that it could hold the other party to it and could lobby the Court properly in the event the CBA was presented for registration. In the absence of any precipitate action by the parties, the normal course of events is that a negotiated collective agreement proceeds to registration, as it cannot in law be implemented until so registered.

However, there isn't a necessary nexus between a CBA and a check-off list as neither depends on the other for their legal existence. A CBA may be registered in the absence of a check-off list and a check-off list may be implemented without a CBA. After substantially reducing staff in 1999, the Respondent still had the Grievants in its employment. The Grievants were unionisable employees and the CBA negotiated between the parties was applicable to them. So the issue of not registering a CBA because unionisable staff had fallen below 10 was a false one. They were still unionisable and capable in law of taking advantage of a collective agreement. It is useful to have a check-off and a CBA run together. It ensures union regular revenue and allows the employer to monitor union members so that if it falls below the requisite simple majority, the employer may raise a query.

The second issue that requires our attention is the continuous assumption in this dispute throughout its history that non-union members have no rights in a CBA. This is another fallacy that is deeply rooted in the psyche of the industrial relations machinery. We can understand an employer using that argument but completely fail to appreciate its genesis in the mind of trade unions and the Ministry of Labour and Human Resource Development. As this Court has time and again repeated, the individual worker has an unfettered right to association with a trade union of his/her choice. That is the Constitutional position as well as that of the ILO Conventions and other regional and international instruments that the country is party to. However, this broad right in the Kenyan context is somewhat curtailed by the provisions of the law that oblige an employee to join a trade union not necessarily of his/her choice but one that is most appropriate to the enterprise that his/her employer is engaged in. So the principle of industrial trade unionism requires that a trade union only seek recognition from an employer if the said trade union is the most appropriate one for the trade or industry. Furthermore, an appropriate trade union needs only a simple majority of the unionisable employees in an enterprise to gain the status of 'sole negotiating party' on behalf of all the unionisable employees in that particular enterprise. Employees who are not members of the recognised trade union may not bring in some other trade union to negotiate on their behalf; only the recognized trade union may conduct such negotiation. In exchange for this monopoly of representation, the recognized trade union is obliged to fully represent the interests of all the unionisable employees, whether they be members or not of the recognized trade union.

This is a simple principle that has stood the test of time in our formula of industrial relations. In a trade dispute, it matters not whether an employee is a member of the trade union or not. The recognized trade union cannot refuse to represent the interests of a non-member. It has no right to do so because it has taken up a monopoly and shut out all other rival unions. The operative terminology is "unionisable employees" and not 'unionised employees' or 'union members'. A unionisable employee may or may not be a member of the recognised union. Moreover, properly representing the interests of all the unionisable "employees" of the enterprise means and includes not only permanent employees but all employees – whether they are permanent or temporary, long term or short term, time rate or piece rate, shift or casual. The word "employee" is clearly defined in law and includes all the above-mentioned categories.

Given the foregoing, we are indeed surprised by the Claimant union's letter of 12th March 2003 begging for a favour on behalf of the Grievants who are "not members of this organization and therefore not subjected to my agreement". The Grievants need not be members of the Claimant union but the union is obliged to properly represent their interests irrespective of their membership status. We also wonder, in view of the fact where the Ministry got the position, used in the investigator's report, that "the union should appreciate the fact that non-union members ought not to benefit from where they have no stake".

It seems to us that this perception of the Grievants as beggars for favours as opposed to people vested with rights seems to have determined their eventual fate in not being consulted and not getting what would otherwise be due to them under the CBA.

It was alleged that the Grievants were treated in the same manner as those before them. We assume this means that other employees had been declared redundant in 1999 but only paid ex gratia amounts and not their full dues under the CBA. Mrs. Onyango suggested that they were paid under a previous CBA of 1996. Whilst all these evidentiary allegations were made from the Bar, no real evidence was produced for the Court to assess. We would have expected past practice to be a strong part of the Respondent's case for the treatment of this dispute on the basis of an agreed precedent.

The Ministry, on behalf of the Minister of Labour, wrote a lengthy in justification of the Respondent's position. We caution the Ministry that it must not allow itself to be perceived as being biased in any way. The Ministry's credibility lies in its neutrality as a conciliator. The Court expects the Ministry to take sufficient care in its investigations and produce recommendations that are so fair that they minimise appeals and references of disputes to the Industrial Court.

We now turn to the issue in dispute on the validity of the agreement between the parties as regards the Grievants. It is alleged that the dispute would not have reached this Court were it not for the internal differences within the Claimant union. What seemed to emerge was that the main reason for the internal dispute was the manner in which the Branch Secretary entered into an agreement with the Respondent leading to the Grievants getting less than what would otherwise be due to them. This Court is not concerned with the internal governance of trade unions or employers. What should and will command our attention are the rights of the parties in the context of a specific dispute. If the trade union was so lax as to allow its Branch officials unrestricted access to negotiation, then the national office should not use this Court to settle its disputes with its own officials. On the other hand we do not know how a trade union will run efficiently if it does not appoint or elect competent officials and then allow them to manage the business of the union. So if Mr. Gwako as Branch Secretary involved himself in a potential trade dispute within his branch then he was perfectly within his rights to do so. The General Secretary will not be heard to say that branch officials are not allowed to negotiate settlements when the same branch officials are allowed to be signatories to a CBA. It is up to the national office to organize and manage its affairs properly and their internal quarrels should not be allowed to spill over and affect the interests of the workers or the employers.

What is more important as a principle is whether the agreement signed by the Branch Secretary without the knowledge or consent of the Grievants was valid? The circumstances of the dispute are that there was a valid CBA in place known to the Grievants as well as the Respondent employer. There was at all times a reasonable expectation on the part of the Grievants that the CBA would be respected and implemented. The CBA sets up specific procedures in the event of an intended termination of employment. Therefore there was a reasonable expectation that the said procedures would be followed so that there is full awareness, information and informed consent on the part of both sides; and especially on the part of employees who are the direct beneficiaries of the CBA. If they were to lose their jobs, they ought at least to know the reasons therefor and the benefits (if any) therefrom. We can safely assume in this case that the employees were fully aware that business was going down and that termination of their employment was also a matter of time. We can also believe that the employer had at some point in time discussed the potential loss of employment by the Grievants with them directly. A retirement or redundancy was in the offing, as it were. If such were the eventual fate of the employees, they were at least aware and reasonably expected that they would be paid their legal benefits, if not more. The fact that they were retained as skeleton staff meant that there was some work for them to do to justify their presence, unlike the many others who had been laid off earlier.

Now that the time for the Grievants to go had also come, what should the employer and the workers representative have done? Clearly, in the face of an existing CBA, there was an obligation to follow the negotiation procedure contained therein. The parties were right to negotiate. The dispute is over the nature of such negotiation. The Claimant union states that the negotiations were improper or insufficient. The Respondent claims that they were proper and binding.

Clause 16 of the applicable CBA is a lengthy clause defining redundancy at length and imposing obligations upon the Respondent to first avoid redundancy by endeavouring to "arrange suitable alternative employment within the company". Thereafter, if redundancy was necessary, the Respondent was "to hold prior discussions with the Union concerning the reasons for and the extent of the intended redundancy" and the first-in-last-out principle was to be applied. The Grievants were also to be given prior consideration for re-engagement...should a vacancy arise according to their qualifications". Finally, there was to be payment of entitlements consequent to the redundancy which included notice or pay in lieu, payment of wages, overtime and other dues, pro-rata leave, related allowances and a severance pay between 20-27 days per completed year of service and any retirement and/or provident fund entitlements (if any).

This is an extensive provision as a safeguard against unfair dismissal of an employee. The spirit of this provision, in our view, is that there be protection of the employee's job in line with the general principle of the right to work and if such protection was found to be unavailable, then there be adequate compensation to ease the impact of loss of livelihood for the employee. The protection is of the employee, not the union or the employer. The negative impact was on the employee, not the union or the employer. The right to know and to comment on the procedure, to be satisfied with the adequacy of consultation and selection of those to be declared redundant, the offer of re-engagement and the calculation of entitlement were all vested rights in favour of the employee. The trade union was a representative in the nature of a trustee as would be an advocate acting on behalf of the employer. The rights in employment and its termination did not vest in the trade union nor do they pass to the trade union to treat as it pleases. The trade union has an obligation to abide by the CBA, just as the employer does. We cannot imagine a situation whereby an employee would lose his right to enforce an agreement merely on the grounds that the trade union negotiated a lesser benefit without the knowledge or consent of the right holder.

In the case before us, the employer wished to amend the terms of the CBA and derogate from the provisions of Clause 16 aforementioned. The employer could offer to do so for very valid reasons including, as in this dispute, that it had run out of money. However such offer must be to the right holder, i.e. the employee, through the trade union as representative. The trade union, as we have earlier stated, was a representative in the nature of a trustee and not a holder of an irrevocable power of attorney.

The CBA is signed with the trade union. The employer deals with the trade union in all disputes at the workplace with employees. Clause 16 required consultation with the trade union for an intended redundancy. Does this entitle the employer to negotiate with the trade union to the exclusion of the employee? In the context of redundancy, we think not. The very fact of redundancy requires that an affected employee be consulted on alternative employment, on the selection of who goes first, on re-engagement and on the correctness of proposed entitlement. There is no room in the interpretation of Clause 16 for action by the trade union without the involvement of the affected employee. If the employee must be consulted on a regular redundancy process, then the employee must of necessity be consulted where the employer wished to declare an unprocedural redundancy without paying the agreed dues.

The employer is proposing a breach of contract and is taking the representative on the side and negotiating the breach without consulting or seeking the consent of the party directly affected. This is tantamount to breach of trust and we are not surprised that in a situation of compromise, the Claimant union's head office concludes impropriety on the part of the employer and the Branch Secretary.

First there is a letter from the Claimant union to the Respondent seeking a favour for the interest of the Grievants who are already being termed 'non-members' and therefore not entitled to the representation of the trade union. Both parties are aware that the law binds them both to implement the CBA in favour of all unionisable employees and not only union members. A few weeks later, the parties agree that the Grievants are now members of the union and they be paid the 'something' that that has been agreed between the two without setting out the basis for calculating the amounts agreed upon. This amount is taken to be in full and final settlement and "only the employer and the union are the parties to use the collective bargaining agreement". It is not clear to us what the last sentence in the agreement means. Is it a further agreement to lock out the employee from challenging the 'secret' agreement, as it were that has been arrived at between the union and the employer? Does it mean that the collective agreement is the property of the employer and the trade union to the exclusion of the employees who are the beneficiaries of the collective agreement?

What emerges from this agreement, in our view, is bad faith on the part of the employer and the trade union in order to undermine the legal interest of the employee. The employer cannot, in the circumstances of such an unfair process, claim from the Court a finding in equity that the said agreement with the union was binding. This Court cannot, in good conscience, allow for such an agreement to stand to the detriment of the Grievants.

We pay no heed to the internal squabbles of the Claimant union. Had there been proper consultation and safeguard of the rights of the Grievants in this case, we would not have hesitated in finding that the agreement was binding on the parties including the Grievants. However, in the circumstances of this case and for the reasons preferred hereinabove, we cannot find for the Respondent.

We order therefore that the Grievants, and each of them, be paid their lawful dues in accordance with the CBA registered by this Court on 26th January, 2000.

As the sitting members also agree, it is so Ordered.

- (1) The Kenya Gazette contains notices of a general nature which do not affect legislation. They are, therefore, submitted to the Government Printer directly.

All "copy" submitted for publication should be prepared on one side of an A4 sheet no matter how small the notice is, each page being numbered, and should be typewritten with double spacing. Copy should be clear, legible and contain no alterations.

Particular attention should be paid to the following points:

- (i) Signature must be supported by rubber-stamping or typing the name of the signatory in capital letters.
- (ii) Dates must be correct and filled in where necessary.
- (iii) Care should be taken to ensure that all headings to notices and references to legislation are up to date and conform with the Revised Edition of the Laws of Kenya.
