Members of the public are invited to inspect the said draft strategy and forward their views and comments thereon to: The Director of Water Development, Ministry of Water and Irrigation, P.O. Box 49720, Nairobi, not later than thirty (30) days from the date of this notice.

Preamble:

Water is an important natural resource to all forms of life and their existence; for mankind, it is the backbone of growth and prosperity. The growing demands for it against the limited temporal natural endowment and its increasing scarcity could result in conflicts and catastrophes.

The hydrological variability causes significant economic losses and the country has to develop the buffering capacity to deal with the shocks of floods and droughts. This buffering capacity can be provided by a mixture of measures including structural ones like dams/pans, dykes, retention basins and boreholes or non-structural ones like catchment, wetland and floodplain management, agricultural policy and land use policy. Impacts of past and present disasters in the form of the El Nino floods and the La Nina drought were so severe that within a few months, they destroyed years of economic growth, devastating an already fragile economy, thus exacerbating poverty.

Against this background, the Government has designed a comprehensive sector development strategy with clear division of roles and partnerships between the government, the private sector and the beneficiaries. The elaborate legal and institutional framework detailed in the Water Act 2002 is aimed at accommodating the new operational environment.

The decentralized water administration approach will create incentives for the private sector and communities to play an active role in water resources management at the national, catchment and sub-catchment levels. Indeed, the World Summit on Sustainable Development (WSSD) held in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 2002 recognized water as a core focus area towards sustainable development contributing to raising awareness to the public and further in placing water high on the international political agenda. It was in this conference that the UN Secretary - General proposed the five key areas of action towards sustainable development: water, energy, health, agriculture and bio-diversity which have been brought together under acronym WEHAB.

Given that Kenya faces serious challenges with regard to the management of its water resources to satisfy sectoral demands, the first National Water Resources Management Strategy (NWRMS) provides a clear, accountable and transparent road map for assessing, maintaining, enhancing, developing and managing the limited available, renewable, fresh water resources using an integrated approach and on a sustainable basis. The low level development of this resource estimated at less than 20% (1.6 billion cubic metres (BCM) per annum) against the surface water potential of 7.4 BCM and groundwater potential of 1.0 BCM per annum calls for extensive investment to achieve maximum utilization of the renewable fraction of the freshwater resources. This will require reversing catchment degradation and controlling pollution.

The country's water scarce category of 647m<sup>3</sup> per capita against the global benchmark of 1000m<sup>3</sup> is reason enough to implement this Strategy which will be in force until amended or revised as provided under section 11 of the Water Act 2002 which shall be initially 3 years after gazetting and 5 years thereafter. The Government has embarked on a structured effort to sensitize the stakeholders and recipient communities on the principles of water governance for the sustainable management of the finite resource to ensure the fulfillment of Economic Recovery Strategy for Wealth and Employment Creation.

Policy Guidelines:

1. Water Resources Availability

Surface and ground water resources are unevenly distributed both in space and time. This is attributed to the variability in rainfall and the diverse climatic and geological conditions. As a result of this, the flow regime of rivers and streams as well as the groundwater flow, vary considerably. Increased human activities, particularly in water catchments areas, has resulted in the reduction and deterioration of areas under forest and constitute a threat to the country's water resources, not only in respect of siltation, but also as regards the run-off, water balance and groundwater recharge characteristics. The effect of this has been the diminishing of the available water resources, some of which have disappeared or dried up thus complicating further the water availability problem.

The basic solution to these problems lie in the preservation, conservation and development of national water resources in the most feasible manner, while applying national and international acceptable standards, for the benefit of all Kenyans. This calls for an effective river basin management and practices, which takes full recognition of the role, which forests and soil conservation measures play in the conservation of water resources. Water catchments areas need therefore, to be identified and delineated and programmes instituted in collaboration with the relevant ministry in-charge of forestry. In addition, groundwater conservation zones need to be identified to avoid depletion of this resource.

The Government will, therefore, make every effort to conserve water when and where it occurs and its utilization will be so regulated as to benefit as many people and sectors as possible. Water levies and fees will be introduced where necessary and applicable for utilization of water from all public watercourses. Such levies/fees will be used in ensuring a healthy state of the nation's water and will include support for research into technologies suited to our water needs. Particular emphasis will be given to the protection and development of Sea/Brackish/Saline/Non-Conventional Sources.

2. Roles and functions at different management levels

The decision making process in respect to water resources has now been decentralized by adopting three water resources management levels (including National, Basin, Sub-basin/Catchments levels) and setting up and or strengthening appropriate institutions clearly defining the role of each and how they relate to each other. Among the roles of these institutions will be to identify vital water catchment areas, including wetlands, and initiate action for the gazetttement for protection purposes.

3. Integrated water resources management

Water resources development contributes enormously to economic productivity and social well-being of human populace as both social and economic activities rely heavily on the supply and quality of freshwater. With the increasing growth in population and the subsequent socio-economic pursuits (including urbanization, industrial production, tourism and agricultural activities) demand for water is increasing rapidly. A stage has been reached where freshwater issues often become the limiting factor for sustainable development and often result in conflicts amongst the various competing sectors.

4. Legal Framework

The legal issues touching on the water sector are contained in the Water Act 2002. There are, however, a total of twenty-six other Acts of Parliament, which have a bearing on issues concerning water. For instance the Agriculture Act, Cap . 318 defines the watercourses and catchment areas in relation to crop production and related activities.

It is necessary to have a mechanism for ensuring that legislation and bye-laws concerned with proper utilization, protection and management of water resources at all levels is regularly reviewed, updated, rationalized, enacted and enforced as appropriate. This requires an appropriate institution with the necessary capacity to enforce the legal framework.

On the international scene, Kenya still has a lot of shared water resources with her neighbours. In the absence of national laws governing the utilization of these waters, it is necessary to examine the requirements of international treaties on water resources and adopt those that are appropriate to our country's conditions and needs.

5. Impact of Water Resources Development on the Environment

Water development will be geared towards improving the environment on which its sustenance depends and will not be expected to adversely affect the quality of water resources in particular and the environment in general. An Environmental Impact assessment Report will, therefore, be made mandatory for all major water developmental activities

6. Water Quality Issues

The long-term objective of the Government is to ensure that all residents in the country have access to clean and potable water. This is only possible, however, if our available water resources are protected from pollution.

To avoid the pollution of our water resources, strict stream effluent discharge standards will be developed for controlling the discharge of wastes into water bodies. It will also be necessary to make water abstraction and disposal permits dynamic and economic instruments for water pollution control.

A process of water quality monitoring of all water bodies and pollution control inspection of potential polluting sources will be put in place. In this regard all factories and other waste water generating concerns will be required to incorporate in their designs the waste water treatment devices.

7. Water Resources Assessment, Monitoring and Information System.

The Ministry of Water and Irrigation will endeavor to establish comprehensive water resource databases, at all the management levels, on self-sustainable basis, for use in the water sector development. These databases will contain updated water resources data at all times and in this regard will put in place water resources assessment and monitoring system in collaboration with relevant organizations and agencies. Funding for the procurement and establishment of Water Resources Assessment tools will be stepped up to ensure that modern equipment is obtained.

Goals and Objectives:

1. National Water Resources Management Strategy Formulation

The overall principles adopted in the formulation of the National Water Resource Management Strategy are:

- (iii) To achieve equitable access to water, that is, equity of access to water services, to the use of water resources, and to the benefits from the use of water resources.
- (iv) To achieve sustainable use of water by making progressive adjustments to water use with the objective of striking a balance between water availability and legitimate water requirements, and by implementing measures to protect water resources.
- (v) To achieve efficient and effective water use for optimum social and economic benefit.

2. Goals and objectives of the National Water Resources Management Strategy.

The overall goal of the National Water Resources Management Strategy is to eradicate poverty through the provision of potable water for human consumption and water for productive use. The fundamental objectives for managing Kenya's water resources are to achieve equitable access to water resources and their sustainable and efficient use.

3. Institutional Framework

The main thrust of the reform is to separate water resources management and development from water services delivery, focussing the Ministry's role on policy formulation, resource mobilization, coordination, evaluation and monitoring; leaving the detailed regulation to a number of parastatal bodies who report to boards that represent different stakeholders' interests. The provision of water services, by water service providers, both from the private and NGO sectors, is to be market driven. Once the reform is complete, the Local Authorities will have to compete with other potential service providers. It will be the responsibility of the newly established institutions, working in concert with Local Authorities, CBOs, NGOs, and the private sector, to ensure the implementation of the strategy.

3.1 Institutional set-up Roles and responsibilities

The roles and responsibilities of these institutions are as tabulated below:

Institution	Roles and Responsibilities
Ministry of Water and Irrigation (MWI)	Development of legislation, policy formulation, sector coordination and guidance, and monitoring and evaluation.

Institution	Roles and Responsibilities
Water Resources Management Authority (WRMA)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>(a) Planning, management, protection and conservation of water resources.</li> <li>(b) Planning, allocation, apportionment, assessment and monitoring of water resources.</li> <li>(c) Issuance of water permits.</li> <li>(d) Water rights and enforcement of permit conditions.</li> <li>(e) Regulation of conservation and abstraction structures.</li> <li>(f) Catchment and water quality management.</li> <li>(g) Regulation and control of water use.</li> <li>(h) Coordination of the IWRM Plan.</li> </ul>
Catchments Area Advisory Committees (CAACs)	Advising WRMA on water resources issues at catchment level.
Water Resource Users Associations (WRUAs)	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>(a) Involvement in decision making process to identify and register water user.</li> <li>(b) Collaboration in water allocation and catchments management.</li> <li>(c) Assisting in water monitoring and information gathering.</li> <li>(d) Conflict resolution and co-operative management of water resources</li> </ul>
The Water Appeal Board (WAB)	Arbitration of water related disputes and conflicts.

4. Strategies

The Strategy provides direction to the water sector as a whole and the relevant water institutions in particular on ensuring water availability in an environmentally acceptable and sustainable way. It takes into account the needs of the sector and the availability of financial, human and other resources. The NWRMS provides a framework for the development of a Catchment Management Strategy (CMS) for each of the catchments. The CMSs will include procedures for water resources management and will be consistent with the NWRMS. The strategies include the following:
